

Q5D Services that foster a trust in technology and hold the needs of the child at the centre of its development such as AutoPlay being turned off as a default, sleep times on Apps, reminder messages to engage in healthy behaviour.

Having a universal reporting system which is accessible and well-known. Children have short-attention spans and are often cautious about acting on their concerns. ChildLine is an example of a service that is so mainstream that children almost don't need to actively seek out its details – they're just known about. We need an online version of this so that children have a clear knowledge of where to go to in order to submit a complaint in a system free of stigmatisation and designed with the child in mind.
